

Julianne Moore Helps Children's Health Fund and Clorox Connect Kids to Care

Julianne Moore showed off her million dollar smile as she kicked off Connect Kids to Care program at the CFH South Bronx Health Care Center in New York City.

The program will help support the Children's Health Fund's goal of providing half a million health care visits to disadvantaged children across the country.

After kicking off the event alongside a number of executive directors, Julianne took time out of her busy schedule to read from her book, Freckleface Strawberry and the Dodgeball Bully, about a child who perceives another child to be a bully.

Meanwhile, Julianne has a new film arriving in theaters on July 7, a comedy-drama called The Kids Are All Right. In the film, the 49-year-old big screen stunner stars alongside Annette Benning as a lesbian couple who conceive two children through artificial insemination. When the eldest child (played by Mia Wasikowska) turns 18, her younger brother (Josh Hutcherson) asks her to contact the sperm bank so the two can meet their biological father (Mark Ruffalo).

Says Julianne: "The wonderful thing is it is a very conventional family – it's just with two women. It's about what it means to be a family, what it means to be in a long-term relationship, all of the things that we know about from being members of a family."
